According to statistics, about a third of people who resort to gold therapy experience side effects.

(Newswire.net -- April 16, 2019) Orlando, FL -- Gold therapy is recognized as one of the first treatments for rheumatoid arthritis. This therapy has been thought to be useful, but there are reasons why it is rarely used nowadays.

Experts warn arthritis sufferers about the dangers of gold therapy. According to some experts, gold is disease modifying antirheumatic drug (DMARD). Today, a more effective, newer, and better tolerated biologic and non-biologic DMARD is used.

It has been found that gold therapy not only treats the symptoms of rheumatoid arthritis, such as swelling and joint pain, but it could also prevent joint damage as well as disability. The use of this therapy has dramatically declined in the last 20 years due to the serious side effects it caused.

There were arthritis sufferers who stated that gold therapy helped reduce inflammation, but administering it could be quite painful.

The Cochrane Database of Systemic Reviews published a review that found individuals with rheumatoid arthritis treated with gold injections experienced fewer swollen joints by 30 percent than the placebo. The researchers suggest that it could be a good short term treatment for individuals with rheumatoid arthritis.

According to statistics, about a third of people who resort to gold therapy experience side effects. Some of these side effects are skin discoloration, skin rashes, bleeding disorders, kidney damage, and bone marrow suppression. These side effects should be closely monitored by health care providers.

Individuals who suffer from pain and other symptoms of arthritis may take into account the use of other pain management options. There are oral pain relievers available that are widely used by arthritis sufferers. Some of the most popular medications are DMARDs and nonsteroidal anti-inflammatory drugs (NSAIDs), which can be taken by mouth.

These are widely thought to be effective and easy pain management remedies. However, they could also cause side effects, some of which are life-threatening.

Safer alternatives like glucosamine have been widely popular among arthritis sufferers. This healing ingredient is believed to be a strong joint health enhancing supplement.

Divine Bounty Glucosamine could be an excellent product to use since it is loaded with high levels of glucosamine. This high-strength formula offers 2000 mg per serving plus methylsulfonylmethane (MSM).

Both of these therapeutic ingredients work together to provide arthritis benefits without causing side effects. What makes this formula even more helpful is that it is free from unwanted ingredients, such as binders, fillers, GMOs, and Stearates. It is even ideal for Vegetarians and Vegans.
