If you are looking to get back in touch with old friends in California, the following are three ways to find people you’ve lost track of.

(Newswire.net -- December 19, 2017) -- California the most populous state, which can make it awfully hard to get in touch with old friends you haven’t seen in years. Perhaps you grew up with the person you are looking for in SoCal, but are now living on the East Coast and would like to send a quick holiday message or a birthday greeting because you’ve suddenly had a flashback to the past when you attended their 12th birthday party.

You remember the date, you remember the name, but where are they now? What are they doing and are they happy? If you are looking to get back in touch with old friends in California, here are three ways to find people you’ve lost track of.

1. Send a Postcard to Their Last Known Address

While this is the old-fashioned way of doing things that predates the Internet by centuries, it is still an effective way to reach old friends. Sometimes your friend lived in a home that had been in the family for more than a generation, so you are pretty confident the postcard will reach the family, at the very least. However, it’s good to remember that California is one of the most transient states, so this may not always work.

2. Take Advantage of the World Wide Web

The Internet isn’t referred to as the World Wide Web for nothing! Of course, you know that the Internet reaches anyone, anywhere, as long as there is a connection. While you can always try to find them on Social sites like Facebook, Twitter, Google, Instagram and so forth, there are times when a name change interferes with finding who you are looking for.

Your friend was 12 when you last saw her and it’s been more than 20 years! She’s probably married now with a happy family and you just won’t find her unless you know her married name. This is where California people finder on sites like Intelius can come in real handy. By listing her maiden name, public records will pop up and you can track her through family members also listed on the results. It’s an amazing way to get in touch with old friends without ever leaving the comfort of your home.

3. Check with Friends You’ve Stayed in Contact With

Sometimes, you never know when a friend of a friend you’ve stayed in contact with just might know what’s become of your long-lost childhood friend. Even though you’ve signed yearbooks as BFF, that’s common to kids who have no clue how easy it is to move on after college and once you’ve started a family of your own.

Even if you haven’t stayed in touch with friends from the same class or neighborhood, find them with a people finder and go from there. Sometimes you’d be surprised just how connected we are in this country with the most recent population of 323,127,513, according to the latest estimate by the United States Census Bureau .

Today, your BFF is the Internet, so learn to how use it and you will surely find your old friends in California!
