(Newswire.net -- November 4, 2018) -- In the fast-paced world of construction; time, money and resources are fundamental to the success of a construction project. Managing all the moving parts of a construction build, whether it be a ground-up project, a new tenant renovation or remodel, having all of the plans and paperwork in place can determine the success or failure of the building project.

There are many factors that go in to the planning, design and execution of a new construction project. Between coordinating plans and layout design to financial / expense forecasting and contractor coordination, a General Contractor can be juggling many things. Having just one thing go wrong cause many unforeseen conflicts that can delay the completion of the project. An important aspect to any construction project is making sure the proper permits are pulled for the job at hand. Pulling permits is a task that needs to happen to ensure that the local county or city understands what type of project and that they approve the project and proposed timeline.

Often getting the proper permit can be time consuming. Knowing all of the regulations that each individual city or municipality has can be daunting. Below are 5 reasons why working with a professional permit expediting company can save time, money and valuable resources during the entire construction process.

#1. Permit expediting companies are business consultants that know the local municipal landscape and are in close relation to local planning committees. These companies work as mediators between the public and private sector to expedite the building permit process, so contractors, architects, and design professionals can have their plans submitted to the proper authorities on time with accuracy. There are many companies that offer these services. One that offers complete permit management and expediting services is Service First Permits.

#2. Working with a company like Service First Permits, who has offices in both Colorado and the San Francisco Bay Area, provides peace of mind during the entire construction process. Builders, contractor or architects will have a better view to what is happening with the permit process. There will be far fewer hold-ups resulting in the timely submittal of permits for the job at hand.

#3. When architects and general contractors work directly with professional permit expediting companies they often save money and resources. Now this might seem a little counter intuitive because these companies do charge fees for their services but having a company manage the permitting process will untimely avoid delays in the build which in turn equate to dollars saved in the long run.

As many professional construction companies know, delays are costly and can often break a job, upsetting many people along the way. It is advisable when working in the construction industry to work with a company that can manage all of the moving parts of the permitting process from planning, design review, blueprint submission through to the completion of a project. Consider contacting a permit expeditor that works in the local municipality today.

#4 Companies like Service First Permits can advise on all aspects of the planning process. They can help navigate unforeseen circumstances before they arise. It is often unclear what type of permit will need to be pulled on any job. Due to the strict building requirements in areas like San Francisco, it is helpful to have someone on the construction projects side who understands the permitting process.

#5. Companies that work with building permit expeditors and permit management firms like Service First Permits, find them to be an invaluable resource, forming long-standing relationships that are mutually beneficial to both companies.

If a company is currently struggling with a building permit or are about to engage in a new construction project, consider finding a permit expediting company in the local area and work with them today!
