California Schools Online is a brand new consumer information resource. Visitors to CaliforniaSchoolsOnline.com may look into education and career training strategies in schools around the state of California.

(Newswire.net -- Aug 24, 2013) Sacramento, CA -- California Schools Online, a new college and career training information resource, is now open to the public.

The CaliforniaSchoolsOnline.com site assists interested individuals who want to find good, affordable universities or other schools in the state of California.

"California has more formal education options than any other state," said site manager Kimberly Kohler, "From private universities such as USC and Stanford to the state colleges and the public community colleges, there is a tremendous amount of choice here."

The CaliforniaSchoolsOnline.com website discusses both classic university schools along with web-based alternatives that are becoming more and more available to students across the state.

Kohler said that her website is intended not just for California residents, but also for anyone who is considering moving to the state to attend school. "Most of our site viewers will come from California," she said, but California attracts so many out-of-state students that we will have plenty of visitors from other states as well."

Kohler additionally said that there is no cost for using the site, "This site is provided totally for free. Prospective students can use our school search widget to find schools in any city of the state," she said, "Plus they can look just for schools that offer the type of degree they are interested in."

"Deciding upon a college major and picking the schools to apply to is a big decision," Kohler concluded, "And we hope that our site might help a few students decide the best career path for their situation."
