Online Canada Schools, a new web-based college consumer website, is now open for business online.

The OnlineCanadaSchools.com website is designed to help students in the USA find online Canadian schools and also help residents of Canada locate online schools in the USA.

"Both Canada and the United States have a great collection of schools that offer courses over the Internet," mentioned site publisher Brent Jensen, "And we are hoping that our website will be an easy way for people to browse through these various schools and find the program that fits their needs the best."

While the OnlineCanadaSchools.com site is centered around online school options, it also provides information about traditional campus-based colleges as well.

"There are some degree programs that are fulfilled entirely through online classes," said Jensen, "But the majority of degrees are built around a combination of in-class courses along with Web-delivered courses."

Jensen further said that while classes delivered online are convenient and work well for many subjects, in-person classes are still the best option for most students. "The small classroom is still the best learning experience for most people," Jensen said, "A student can benefit from being around other students and learning from their experiences."

"There are also some learning experiences that can't be duplicated at home," continued Jensen, "Any topic that requires use of equipment or items that aren't typically available at home just can't be replicated through an online class. Plus, classroom involvement can help students build a network of classmates that they can keep in contact with during their professional career, which may help them with future employment opportunities."

"Nobody is really sure what the higher education landscape will look like 30 years from today," Jensen concluded, "But we can predict that there are going to be big changes in school options, vocational training and how education is delivered."

The web site is free of charge for all visitors.
