A brand new website designed to help college students learn more about culinary arts careers and training has launched in Cleveland, Ohio.

The ClevelandCookingSchool.com internet site is a project conceived to help visitors understand more about culinary jobs and training alternatives within the professional chef field.

The web site's publisher Stephanie Staples suggests site visitors to www.ClevelandCookingSchool.com can easily search for institutions that offer academic classes in Cleveland and other cities in the northeast section of Ohio.

"I think that the culinary field offers a lot of opportunity when it comes to career choices," suggested Staples, "First, very few positions in this field require a four-year college degree in order to get started, and, second, the culinary and hospitality fields experience a higher-than-average turnover and job movement rate. Chefs and other workers experience a greater level of transitions to different jobs than workers in almost any other career field do."

"If you're an experienced chef or restaurant manager, you have skills that are easily transferred from one position to the next," continued Staples, "Chefs and other experienced hospitality professionals have no problem when moving from a position at one restaurant to another."

"The culinary arts field is certainly a popular one," concluded Staples, "And I think of lot of that has to do with just how visible it is. Chefs, cooks, and restaurant staff have jobs that people just happen to notice in everyday life. Plus, there is so much flexibility when it comes to the actual working hours. Employees can work days, nights or weekends, so it gives them the option to design a work week that suits their lifestyle."

Staples announced that the site is free to use for anyone.
