(Newswire.net -- February 20, 2015) -- Technology has brought about a new innovation in telemedicine. With the use of technology, you are now about to use the internet and a computer to complete your doctor visit. Of course, there are certain things that need to be completed in a doctors' office, however the majority of appointments can be done via telemedicine.

Some of you may be questioning what telemedicine actually is. It's simple, it is the new age version of doing in-house doctor visits. These online sessions are very simple to complete and you can begin with slowly introducing these video sessions to your existing patients. Try scheduling every other appointment as a video session, so that your patient can be comfortable with the different platforms available as well as how the process works.

Telemedicine is an easy process to start with your practice. You simply set your practice up with a provider that provides the web interface platforms for your business, choose a package with the provider and the rest takes care of itself. Marketing services allow you to market to new patients and gain patients to your practice. You are able to obtain multi-state licensure and complete your appointments with ease.

All telemedicine services still have to comply with HIPAA guidelines, which means privacy and protection of your medical information. This is done through encrypted security provided by your service provider. Payments for services are taken via credit or debit card and then place in your account by your service provider.

You are still able to complete the same normal doctor appointments via the web. These appointments include general and routine check-ups and other types of services provided by most types of physicians. Of course, there are certain things that cannot be covered through a video internet conferencing, but the majority of the services will be covered and available. There are many benefits available to using this type of system, and it begins with you having more availability for your patients, which increases your marketability.
