(Newswire.net -- June 12, 2019) Orlando, FL -- New statistics reveal that rheumatoid arthritis affects more than 1.3 million individuals in the United States. Worldwide, it affects as much as 1 percent of the population.

According to experts, this complex disease results from the occurrence of an autoimmune disorder. It is more common than autoimmune disorders like Crohn's disease, psoriasis, lupus, and multiple sclerosis.

It is worth realizing that this condition often affects those between the ages 30 and 60 years of age. Aside from age, there are other risk factors like genetics, hormonal changes, and lifestyle habits like smoking.

This painful disease is often addressed through the use of pain medications, which only work in managing symptoms. It is important to remember that rheumatoid arthritis has no known cure yet, and it can only be managed.

Individuals with RA are recommended to manage symptoms like joint pain and stiffness as well as joint swelling and redness. When inflammation increases, it also leads to more symptoms like weight loss, low-grade fever, chronic fatigue, and loss of appetite.

While medications like nonsteroidal anti-inflammatory drugs (NSAIDs) are helpful, it is worth realizing that their use could produce some side effects. There are experts who strongly recommend finding some safer alternative to these pharmaceutical drugs.

There are nutrients like vitamin B6 found beneficial in cases of rheumatoid arthritis, particularly in fighting inflammation linked with it.

Some scientists suggest that vitamin B6 could aid in decreasing symptoms linked with rheumatoid arthritis.

It is worth mentioning that a study involving 43 adults with rheumatoid arthritis was carried out. It involved intake of 5mg of folic acid alone or 100 mg of vitamin B6 with 5 mg of folic acid daily.

It has been found that those treated with B6 achieved significantly reduced levels of pro-inflammatory molecules after 12 weeks.

Experts strongly suggest choosing a formula that is not only highly potent and pure, but is also equipped with a highly informational and honest label.

Divine Bounty B Vitamin Complex is believed widely to be one of the best options. There are many reasons why this supplement is gaining increasing popularity in the international market.

Every capsule has Choline, Pantothenic acid, Biotin, Vitamin B12, Folic Acid, Niacin, Riboflavin, Thiamin, and vitamin B6.
